Just installed Office 2007 and the program is definitely not installed on my 64-bit system. But I don't have a problem with installing Office 2007, this is a separate issue: Installing Office 2007, just getting started Microsoft's request for support of the word "Supported", along with the requirement that any request for support must include a unique code of $900, it sure seems like they are doing a rush job on the new Office. Click to expand... Except its not that. Quite the opposite: [Microsoft] has accelerated the delivery of the supported version of Office 2007, known as 2007 Service Pack 1. In addition to Service Pack 1, our testers will also begin evaluating a privately-released first-of-its-kind Office 2007 release candidate (RC1) next week. We are using the RC1 release as a test tool for a broader set of users to help drive us to a successful launch. If this office 2007 RC is different from the final product I am considering moving to a different office suite that supports office 2007. Its not like the previous Office versions where you could get a beta version of Office and use it for a while until the release. They are just trying to move to a 24/7/365 environment so that they can more easily gather bug reports, collect support requests, etc. So I'm not saying that they should postpone their release and that it is a bad idea. I'm saying that if the RC1 is not the final product, it could be that we will be stuck with something that is not working. If I'm right, it would make sense to buy a copy of Office 77a5ca646e
