I found this in the Real World book by Richard Hamming: The internal resistance is then determined from Ohm's law: $U = IR$. We put the power across the arm and solve for R by using the law of conservation of energy: $P = I^2 R = 0 \rightarrow R \geq 1/(3.9 \text{ mW})$. Because the power generated is given by $V \cdot I = U$, the energy output will be related to the voltage across the arm, which is by definition equal to V_0/n . The internal resistance of the coil becomes a function of the number of windings n , and thus, of the size of the coil. For information, the number of windings is equal to $N = \frac{1}{R}$. I don't understand the meaning of the sentence. The author says that to the given voltage V_0 across the coil, there is a corresponding current I which is related by $U=RI$. If this is true, why does the author say "
