Descending limb and male reproductive tract system development during gonadogenesis of the African clawed frog Xenopus laevis. X. laevis has been established as an important model for the study of amphibian embryo development, including organogenesis. The present study compares the embryonic development of the male limb mesenchyme, the testis, and the ovotestis as they relate to growth, patterning and differentiation of the male reproductive tract in X. laevis. We first demonstrate that X. laevis use a limb bud elongation rather than a pouch mode of gonadogenesis. Next we describe development of the testicular cords that form

Coronaviruses (CoVs) are a large family of RNA viruses that cause respiratory and enteric illnesses in humans and a variety of animals. Among the most commonly circulating human CoVs are OC43 and 229E and, in the past two decades, a number of new human coronaviruses have been identified, including HCoV-NL63 and HCoV-HKU1. The first animal CoVs, which were identified in the 1960s, include mouse hepatitis virus (MHV), bovine coronavirus (BCoV) and porcine transmissible gastroenteritis virus (TGEV). Coronaviruses possess a relatively large, single-stranded, positive-sense RNA genome of approximately 30 kb. The genome is complex with open reading frames (ORFs) 1a and 1b, which encode viral replicase proteins, and a third ORF encoding accessory proteins. An eighth ORF, ORF3, is present in some CoVs; this region is variable in size, containing one to several overlapping ORFs. The first two ORFs are expressed by ribosomes located in the nucleolus, while the rest of the genome is translated in viral replicase-associated membranes (RER). Coronaviruses contain a single polypeptide chain containing the structural proteins (i.e., spike (S), small envelope (E), membrane (M) and nucleocapsid (N)) and several non-structural proteins, including RNA-dependent RNA polymerase (RNAP), helicase and methyl transferase. S protein is a glycosylated integral membrane protein. There are two functional domains in the S protein: an N 1cb139a0ed
