If you start your job search based on priorities rather than a series of skills, recruiters and hiring managers will always recognize your strengths and will be able to match you with jobs you are really suited to. Make a budget. Set realistic numbers for your dreams and what you feel you deserve. If your job is good enough to support your needs, then it's good enough! Don't take a job just to take a job. If you've got good marketable skills and a great offer, go ahead and take it, but balance your job search with your needs and your dreams. Make a plan, not a wish list. Making your list of goals is a great way to get started, but you'll want to see those goals as a list of concrete achievements. Think of your goals as two-year goals and write them like that. For example: Two-year goal to be a music producer. Two-year goal to learn as much about music and marketing as possible. Two-year goal to start building a client base f30f4ceada
