License: Download the software for free and use it at your own risk. The author is not liable for any damage done to your device or your data. Description: Objects are similar to files in that they have a specific place in which they exist. While a file remains in a file cabinet and cannot be transported, an object can be moved to another device. Unlike files, however, objects have attributes and data, which helps you organize and manage the data. When you use an object, you have to be aware of its attributes, and do not treat it like a file. There are two kinds of objects: regular objects and special objects. Regular objects are the ones you see in every directory: files, folders, and drives. All regular objects have properties, which can be accessed. Special objects are the ones you cannot access. There are two types of special objects: internet and internet file extensions. An internet object can be accessed by anyone who has access to the internet. An internet file extension can be accessed by a computer. To access an object, you can use a folder browser, which is a tree structure that displays folders, drives, and special objects. Object Explorer provides file/folder browsing, and all objects in the computer can be viewed and edited. The size of an object can be measured by checking the file size. When you open an object, you can read the data, create new objects, remove objects, or share the object. To open an object, you can right-click on the object or select the object in the Explorer window, then click on the Open button. Or, you can go to an object's properties by right-clicking on the object, then select Properties from the context menu. To create new objects, select an existing object, and then right-click on the selected object and select New from the context menu. You can also drag and drop objects to create new objects. Object properties: - Name: This is the name of the object.
