What happens at the polling station is rarely noticed. Indeed, it is the election away from the polls that many people feel more intensely about. In the coming weeks, voters will be bombarded with the latest campaign ads and with letters from political parties. These ads will undoubtedly make light of particular policies and personalities, as well as sometimes slap the other party in the face. On election day, people will also be caught up in the frenzy of what they will see for president, what their political party will be represented by, and what their preferred candidate will really stand for. For some, these thoughts may seem irrelevant, while others will think about the very meaning of elections and democracy. Advertisement What will that mean for your community? What will your votes say? And more importantly, what will it say about your city, county, or state when the results come in? The current recession has already shifted the political landscape in many communities. The economic downturn exacerbated partisan feelings along regional political lines and fanned the flames of political polarization. Both parties have been campaigning to attract voters by focusing on economic issues, but have also borrowed from each other's campaign platforms to appeal to voters on specific issues. Both parties also make claims about specific local priorities. Some communities and cities are benefiting or struggling from many different policies and regulations in Washington. Ask yourself: where will your vote come from? Which party is most concerned with what your community needs right now? And which party has the best tools to solve the pressing problems that you face? Focusing on these issues, as well as the important role that faith-based organizations play in communities, can help voters think about the election in ways that will help them be more informed and engaged. If you are voting by mail, there is no reason to go to the polls. Instead, focus on being informed. Read your county's letter of how your vote will be counted, as well as other relevant information. Figure out your choices at Vote.com, a nonpartisan, online voter assistance guide. If you do decide to vote in person, consider the following questions to make sure you get your vote to count. To assess the use of a specific nutritional assessment form to collect information regarding dietary intake, in a large, international, clinical research study. Data collection was performed by trained personnel using the nutritional assessment form. Four primary care and specialty clinics within a National Institutes of Health-funded multicenter AIDS Clinical Trials Group (ACTG) study of women with HIV infection. Six thousand women, aged 18 to 59 years, with an RNA-positive CD4+ T cell count of 350 to 2500 cells/microL and an aspartate aminotransferase (AST) to alanine aminotransferase (ALT) ratio of 1 or less. Of the 6,000 women enrolled, 90% completed one or more nutrition forms. Mean amounts of food intake collected per day were higher than self-reported typical amounts for each food; however, a substantial percentage of women did not report typical amounts. Food and nutrient intake was affected by race/ethnicity and race/ethnicity and CD4 T cell count. Fat and fat-soluble vitamin intake was reduced among women with low CD4 T cell counts. The significant number of participants who completed the nutrition form (90%) and the high percentage of women who had varied or usual dietary intakes compared with their previous reports indicate that the form can be used to assess dietary intake in clinical research. These data indicate that the form is feasible for assessing usual dietary intake in a large cohort of women.
