We investigated genetic variation in the freshwater bivalve Sphaerium corneum (Linnaeus, 1758), which is the most important host of the trematode Echinostoma revolutum (Rudolphi, 1819). A total of 18 microsatellites, all developed for other organisms, were initially tested for applicability in this species. Cross-amplification was observed in nine of them and six were polymorphic. We used these six microsatellites to assess genotypic variability in S. corneum collected in the upper Río de la Plata basin, Argentina. We also estimated the effective number of alleles, the expected and observed heterozygosity, and the probability of identity of the loci, as well as intra and interindividual variability in this host. The results revealed a moderate to high degree of genetic variability. The highest number of alleles was recorded for the microsatellite PCG075 and the highest heterozygosity for the locus SCS25. The probability of identity was higher in the upper Río de la Plata basin than in the lower Río de la Plata. The values of the other genetic parameters show intra and interindividual variability in this species. We also report that 32% of the samples had a mixed infection with another trematode species.
