Thursday, November 21, 2011 Day 6 Tuesday: Best I Ever Had by Kristen Foster The scariest part of writing a book is the blank page. Even once it has finished, you can't jump to the next chapter immediately, but have to dip back in and feel around the edge before you can discover what's there. This morning, I sat with my notebook and a cup of coffee and turned to the middle of my third book. The blank page is a little wider than it used to be, now. It's also now chock-full of the scenes I will write as I discover what happens next. Like a puzzle, my room has emptied and now rests upon a simple table. The box of this book is full, now. In my last few posts, I gave away the first chapter of this book. As I write this, I'm in the middle of the second chapter. Little pieces of story are being put together. I am feeling around the edges of this latest book, getting to know her. I needed time to run through the scenes, to soak up the atmosphere. To feel the atmosphere of my new city. To remember how the story began. And to get to know my main character. A new city is a different kind of city to write about. I'm not used to it yet. It takes me a little longer to get here. So let's take a look at the first place I ever
