consequences. As a result, we are a society suffering from debilitating psychological disorders caused by the acceptance of others' negativity. With actions such as bullying and bullying of other mental disorders, acceptance of these behaviors becomes a cultural norm. Acceptance is the ability to let someone else do something. There can be many reasons for this: doing so may make you feel better about your own situation, or it might make some kind of sense that the other person is doing what he or she thinks is the best thing to do at that moment. The phrase "acceptance of someone's actions" is technically wrong, since you are not accepting someone's actions as the correct or valid actions for that person to take. You are letting the other person continue to make his or her own choices, which may or may not match your own personal values. Acceptance of others' negativity, even to the point of allowing other people to manipulate you, is dangerous. As a result, society now suffers from serious mental disorders, including depression, anxiety, and many other psychological issues. We are not victims to the negativity of others, but all too often we allow them to make us victims to their behavior. We may allow others to pressure us to act in ways that are contrary to our own beliefs and values. If we blindly accept these behaviors from others without challenging them and refusing to allow others to run our lives, we suffer from what is commonly called "victimization."

Yet this is often what we do. Many of us, without realizing it, accept the negativity of others, including relatives, friends, significant other, teachers, bosses, and other individuals. But for the most part, acceptance of others' negativity is a result of several factors: They have a high need for attention and approval. They are the victim of negative behaviors and, therefore, feel that they have
