In an announcement on Friday, the company said it's joined the Switzerland-based startup Blockstack, an organization that's building the software behind the nascent but growing blockchain, which is also the software underlying the ethereum protocol. This gives Google Chrome more options for what to do with people's browser data, including securely storing records or signing on to third-party services that accept the cryptocurrency ether, according to Blockstack's whitepaper. The big news isn't the first time Google and blockchain have intersected. In April 2014, The Wall Street Journal reported that Google Inc. tested a prototype for a blockchain-powered distributed computing project. And in January, Google announced the beta release of its own Chrome for blockchains. Users can now browse the web while sending transactions with ether on the ethereum blockchain. But the move from a computer-bound technology to browser
