Pellet extraction devices have been widely used to remove PMMA particles from irrigation systems. Little is known about the effectiveness of these devices. To compare the effectiveness of a new and a well-established irrigation technique in extracting polymethylmethacrylate (PMMA) particles from an in vitro irrigation system. A new irrigation system was compared with a previously described positive pressure ventilation (PPV) technique in removing PMMA particles from a hypothetical in vitro irrigation system. The new system consisted of an aspiration pump and a vacuum pump, which was used to suction the irrigation fluid to an aspiration filter, through which the PMMA particles were trapped. The PPV system consisted of a ventilation bellows connected to a standard ventilator. Flow rates of 8 L/min, 10 L/min and 20 L/min were evaluated. Suction pressures of 0, 20 and 40 mmHg were used. Twenty milligrams of PMMA spacer beads were placed in a plastic bag to serve as a control. The rate of flow and suction pressure did not significantly influence the effectiveness of either technique. However, a significant difference in the number of trapped particles was found between the aspiration and PPV technique for each setting of flow and suction pressure. The aspiration pump system is considerably more effective in removing PMMA spacer beads from an in vitro irrigation system than PPV at the same suction pressures. The new aspiration pump system is as effective as the previously described PPV method for extraction of PMMA debris in an in vitro irrigation system.Even as a kid, I was fascinated by different aspects of life. Whether it was my mates playing computer games or father and his friends playing chess, I would spend time with them in our slum locality chatting. My father being a very spirited and outgoing person always enjoyed the company of friends, with whom he spent most of his time discussing his hobby- of playing chess. As time passed, my father and his friends would drop in somewhere during the night, to enjoy a drink or two together. My father would initiate it

I have configured NetworkManager to use a vpn connection. It works perfectly, but only when I explicitly tell it to use a vpn connection. I have also configured my laptop to use a custom route. In my Vpn connection there is an option to "Create auto-route". I do not want to connect to a vpn connection just yet, but I want to allow my laptop to use a custom route to another network. Is there a way to have NetworkManager use a vpn connection as my "default" route? A: Yes, for newer versions of networkmanager: Connect to a VPN connection In the NetworkManager applet, click on the VPN icon. This brings up the list of VPN connections. Click on the one you want to make the default VPN connection. You will get a notice that it is on the default route. You can then continue your configuration. A: The network manager applet in the tray (assuming you're using Gnome) can be configured to use a VPN connection, or a 'dynamic' connection (ie, "created at connection"). The network manager applet is a handy way to manage your internet connection when you have a laptop. I usually give it a static IP address in order to be able to assign that IP address to a laptop for a few days, instead of just editing /etc/network/interfaces, but after that it doesn't really matter where it's configured. You can add a connection in the same menu with dynamic, static, etc. If you want to use a dynamic connection by default, do what you did, but enable "Create auto-route" in that VPN connection. From the settings window, click on the "Tunnel section" to see the "Type" field, it should say "Tunnel". This option will make a new connection, but it will be used automatically
