For.The robotic arm is the finishing touch for the creation of the first FDA-cleared and commercially available surgical robot. By Dana Tyler, Senior Editor April 13, 2013 -- The da Vinci surgical system, which was introduced in 2000, revolutionized laparoscopic surgery. Through "endoscopic" robotic surgery, doctors can operate with dexterity and precision using small incisions. The da Vinci system is expensive and requires a relatively long learning curve, but it has changed the medical industry, transforming the way doctors do many operations. Now a new surgical robot is taking that concept further. The da Vinci-S is a complex system that, while still in clinical trials, offers a new dimension in minimally invasive surgery. In addition to reducing the size of the incision, doctors can also use it to perform some operations that were virtually impossible before, such as removing a lung, a kidney or a bladder. The da Vinci-S allows surgeons to operate through a single portal, while another surgeon operates the other half. A surgeon operates the arm of the da Vinci-S system, and a computer on a nearby computer screen controls its movements. The surgeon is able to see the instrument tip in real time on the computer screen, helping him or her direct the arm. "The da Vinci-S is able to do more than before, including things that I couldn't do with any other system," explains Dr. Jose Constantino, MD, PhD, head of the minilaparoscopy group at Astellas Institute for Regenerative Medicine
