Director Dino De Laurentiis: "You can say Sophia Loren was exploited. The problem was that she was exploited as a woman. She was just a pretty face and not a serious actress. I loved her for her beauty. She was a perfect girl." (Getty) The Hollywood Reporter asked professional Italian film and TV actress

Sophia Loren about her career and her experience of sexism. Can you tell us about your favourite memories of the 1950s? I think in the 1950s I was very happy, because I was free. It was not a formal studio system like now. I was working on my own. Nobody told me what to do. I was lucky that way. You worked with the world's biggest film stars like Marcello Mastroianni, and worked with Italian director Michelangelo Antonioni. Did you have any experiences of sexism? I think sexism existed but I can't tell you exactly how. I was very naive. Sometimes I was treated well. But there were directors who would say, 'I don't like your face.' 'You are a cold person, you just want my money.' I found that and tried to avoid it. I've never had troubles with my husband, Federico Fellini. We had a lot of problems with other people. I was made to do terrible things in my films, because they didn't like my voice. They would ask me to "sing." There was no problem in the studio where I was. I was the star and they were used to me.

How did you get to be a star? I think, like any young, beautiful woman, I was in the right place at the right time. It was my luck. You were considered the queen of Italian films in the 1950s.
