The scandal broke on Wednesday and has led to several high profile arrests. For parents who are concerned their children could be caught up in the scandal, here are some simple steps you can take to protect them. Delete the college admissions app Colleges require parental consent to access information about their child. Some of the colleges targeted by the scandal had an app that parents could download so that they could keep an eye on what their children are doing online. Some people also gave their children apps on their own phones, which they could use to access their emails and social media accounts. It is possible that your child might have given you their password, so make sure you check them regularly. The college admissions scam was in operation for more than a decade and the FBI says, as of 10 December 2018, 3,000 people have been charged. If you haven't downloaded the app, and you think your child may have given it to you, do so now. Close your children's social media accounts If your children had the college admissions app on their phone, it could have been used to access their social media accounts. Image copyright Reuters Image caption Parents of children involved in the college admissions scam were given login details to their children's social media accounts It is therefore a good idea to change the password of any social media accounts your children have access to. Avoid inviting anyone into your children's social media accounts If your children have let someone in, they may still be able to access their accounts, even if you change the passwords. If you need to invite anyone into your children's social media accounts, you can send them a text message instead of an email so that it's more difficult for anyone to see what you are doing.
