The history of the game dates back to 2004, when one of the most successful games "Flappy Bird" was created. I had the chance to actually play that game while developing mine and it was an unforgettable experience. I also played the original version of Atari game "E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial" and I experienced a similar situation of being alone in a forest against a monster who is very hungry and you must outsmart him in order to survive. Those games are still a part of my life and they served as an inspiration for this one. The title of the game is very close to "E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial" and I want to create a similar situation. The game has a strong survival mechanic so you'll have to do really smart things to survive as well. Special Thanks: I'd like to thank everyone who helped me in my journey to finally release the game on Steam and PlayStation 4. I wouldn't be doing this without the support of my family, who has been very patient and understanding about my decision to take an extended time in developing the game. This game was supposed to be released years ago. Your patience is really appreciated. My name is Michael and I'm a nobody from Western Canada. I decided to come up with a concept for a VR-based game. The idea came to me when I was reading a book about American Indians stories. I thought it would be cool if my favorite video game characters, like Indiana Jones or Lara Croft, took part in those stories. I had an idea how those stories could turn out, and I decided to go with it. The concept of the game took a turn when my sister asked me to come and visit her in Vancouver. I decided to put the idea for the game to rest, and let's see where this will lead us. What I have to say: I've been working on this game for over four years. I can say that it has taken a lot more time than I was expecting. I've put a lot of my free time, nights and weekends on this project. I'm a full-time programmer, a parent and I'm married. My wife didn't feel like this project was the best use of our time, as there were a lot of other things that deserved more time than just a few hours here and there. She was right. I've taken her advice to have the courage to pursue my dreams and to go for it. This game was

What's new:

Formation The Grizzly Valley Formation is a geologic formation in North Idaho and Oregon. In Washington, it forms the south wall of the Boise Basin. It is also in the Cache Creek Formation. It preserves fossils dating back to the Carboniferous period. The formation consists of a lithostratigraphic column made up of alternating units of shallow marine and estuarine sandstone, shale, siltstone, and fluvial deposits. It is estimated to have begun growing in the Mazon Creek system in the Late Devonian, and continued to grow more rapidly into the Early Carboniferous, reaching a peak in mid-Cenozoic. The formation has been somewhat erratically referred to as "Grizzly Valley Formation," "Bear Valley Formation," or even "Old Horse Creek Formation." Regional geology During the Cretaceous period, a large, inland sea covered much of the greater Puget Lowland, with a depth of some 300 feet. The ocean was ringed by evaporite depositional rocks that were buried in the subsequent inland formation of the Columbia River. The formation overlies the western margin of the Western Interior Seaway. The intermittent precipitation left rich soil deposits and deposited large amounts of sediment on the floor of the ocean; the formation is a fossiliferous formation that preserves species of some of the smallest marine invertebrates known, little more than in size. Unlike much of the rest of the Pacific Northwest, the formation is part of the modern-day Great Basin province. It is believed to have originated in the western margin of the last epeiric sea which was penetrated by a stable rift, which produced Cenozoic mudflow, and the formation continued to grow until the end of the Eocene. Near the end of the Mesozoic, the formation began to erode as the western margin of the continent begun to rise. It eventually formed the modern highlands of the western-most paleolakes of Oregon, with only small areas of the formation dissected by faults. The formation is the southern wall of the Idaho Basin, as well as the western edge of a small marine basin, extending southwest from Idaho to western Montana, and is on the eastern slope of the faults and mountains. This area may be subject to a magnitude 7 earthquake, whose range may include western Idaho and north into California; such a quake would release large amounts of energy
