and. Comparison of methods of estimating the range for the lower bound on left atrial pressure in mechanically ventilated patients. The accuracy of two methods of estimating the range for the lower bound of left atrial pressure (LAP) in mechanically ventilated patients is examined. The first method involved use of a nomogram incorporating predicted pulmonary artery occlusion pressures (PAOPs) at end-expiration and actual PAOPs at end-inspiration determined from the respiratory mechanics of a series of patients undergoing elective surgery. The second method involved use of a preset nomogram of the predicted value for PAOP at end-expiration to estimate the range for LAP. The estimated lower bound of LAP in both groups was compared with the predicted lower bound of PAOP in an anesthetized, paralyzed, and ventilated canine model. Both methods of estimating the lower bound of LAP in mechanically ventilated patients were effective in differentiating between the low pulmonary vascular resistance (PVR) and high PVR groups, as indicated by the fact that the actual and predicted values for LAP were not significantly different. The predicted values for LAP were significantly lower than actual LAP in patients with high PVR, indicating

The product produced is the acetic acid, while its by-product is carbon dioxide. The proposed project aims to convert carbon dioxide, the by-product of the process, to the value-added product of the acetic acid. The process, which is termed the carbon dioxide valorization process, will utilize a small amount of hydrogen to react with the carbon dioxide produced and convert it into acetone. The research project will be led by a research team with expertise in two areas: (i) new methodologies for re-organization of a complicated system, and (ii) the environmental remediation and energy generation sectors. Therefore, the proposal also involves collaboration with scientists from these two areas. In pursuit of these objectives, the following specific aims will be addressed: (i) design and implement methods to stabilize and regenerate the catalyst, as well as the polymerization catalyst and its supports. These methods will decrease the deactivation and minimize the loss of the catalyst and its supports; (ii) design and implement methods to utilize heat produced by the exothermic reaction, enabling the process to be integrated within a fixed-bed or moving-bed reactor; (iii) design and implement methods to improve the efficiency of the hydrogenation process, by minimizing the formation of undesired by-products. As a part of this aim, the application will investigate different methods including the use of microwave radiation, and (iv) evaluate the long-term performance of the catalysts and supports through regeneration, and carry out product analysis.
