I've never encountered the term. Is it a western double-drink? A double Canadian? A double English (or English & Western)? I'd say it's a western double-drink as all the components are available in the US - but that's purely my knee-jerk reaction. Double-drink. Kaffee und Kognak. The first one is German, the second one is Swedish. The double-drink in Poland is either just lemonade or ginek (a lighter cocktail) with soda or ice. In Mexico, it's a double iced tea (called "champurrado"); in Cuba, it's a blended rum and grapefruit juice drink called "cuba libre" (one of the more popular drinks there). In South America, it's a similar cocktail, called "cortado" (or double-dougie, for short). In Spain, it's a mixture of red wine, cream, and milk called "jugo de ajo", commonly served as a dessert. In the Midwest, it's commonly known as a double espresso, as coffee prices in the area are extremely high. These drinks are usually always called "double-drinks". This is because in the US and Canada, the definition of a "drink" is usually a cocktail rather than a "glass". A glass, as such, is usually larger than a drink and therefore a double-drink may be three or more drinks (8oz or
