Skin cancer and long-term occupational exposure to solar radiation. Solar irradiance in the UVB and UVA range was measured on the ground, under an open arbor, and in forest areas affected by different types of arbor-regeneration treatments (deciduous, coniferous, mixed) at two different periods of the year (spring and autumn) and in three different weather conditions (cloudy, sunny, and overcast). Total UVB dose was calculated and is presented according to recommended reference values published by the National Renewable Energy Laboratory. A risk-management study related to solar radiation in a tree nursery was conducted by the Italian National Institute of Health, and occupational exposure to solar radiation of tree nursery workers was estimated according to personal UV dosimetry. In the nursery workers' mean total annual occupational UVB dose, sex differences were found with regard to the type of outdoor work activity and the time of the year. Sex differences due to the type of occupation were found only in the spring period. Sex differences in the occupational exposure to solar radiation of the nursery workers were found only in overcast conditions and in the overall exposure to UV. The evaluation of the risks to the skin, compared to the vitamin D synthesis, yielded slightly higher individual risks. In the study area, only a small percentage of the population was exposed to UV doses above the lowest recommended limit, the corresponding percentages being 10.6 and 34.9% for the vegetative production and the grass production, respectively. This percentage increased to 50.6 and 59.7% for the open arbor and wood regeneration, respectively. Since the operational need for UVA protection was evaluated as not evident, the application of UVA filtering

Altered current distribution in nitrogen-vacated multilayer model-theoretically studied based on high-resolution eTOFMS data. A multilayer model is proposed to practically implement a structure-based investigation on nitrogen-vacated multilayer films using high-resolution mass spectrometry. Based on ion source efficiency correction, high-resolution mass spectrometry and spectrospatial distribution correlation analysis of the nitrogen-vacated multilayer model, reasonable structural models can be easily deduced. The experimental feasibility of the proposed model for studying film structure and fabrication mechanism is demonstrated by a study on multilayer graphene, alkanethiolate, bilayer graphene and a bilayer graphene/mica system. The investigation results imply that the nitrogen-vacated film can selectively and locally confine current pathways to different film regions and can also reduce electrical conductivity in the heterojunction areas of graphene and layered transition-metal dichalcogenides. result provides theoretical evidence of nitrogen vacancy effect in layered materials. Furthermore, the proposed model is expected to be generally applicable to other material systems that involve nitrogen-based defects. The method developed can serve as a useful tool for the study of the current distribution in layered heterojunction materials.

Q: Sponge cake vs cake-pop layer cake While I have made both, I can't really think of a difference in taste or texture, other than perhaps the sponge cake is simply richer. What is the difference in using a cake-pop or layer cake mold, and when is each appropriate?

A: The top layer of sponge cake will have a higher moisture content as it has been under high heat. Thus, it will drip more while you're eating and will feel a little denser, which is why it's appropriate for over-eating the outside of a layer cake... You can always eat the remaining cake, and that's what I tend to do. On the other hand, I've had
