Many national and international societies have been frustrated by the lack of the development of high, intensity, short duration, rapid strength protocols for muscle building in athletes. In particular, the vast majority of strength programs have been designed for the elderly, athletes who are competitive, and those who are trying to recover from an injury or surgery. Due to the limited data supporting the efficacy of these programs, there is no data that these programs stimulate neuromuscular adaptations. While the traditional barbell squat is the most popular variation of the squat, it is not a high intensity exercise. In addition to the lack of data, the squat is the top exercise being used for strength development in athletes. While implementing a squat-only program would be beneficial for strength development, an associated strength program is needed for athletes in addition to the traditional squat. The Functional Training Tension Training (FTT) program, currently being utilized in
