Lost Patrol, a 1990 hidden object adventure game is dedicated to the memory of Lieutenant R.J. Keats, USMC. Inspired by a true event, the game presents the sequel to the 1987 hit video game The Lost Patrol – an adventure set during the Vietnam War. With the help of the player, R.J. Keats will travel through the jungles of Vietnam and help to recover his helicopter and its crew. Players must read the story carefully to find all the clues, solve the puzzles and rescue the crew from the hands of the enemy. During the action, players will be exposed to a variety of exciting challenges, including mini games, exploration and time puzzles. Now that I have a bit of free time on my hands, I'd like to look back at some of the information I presented at the Game Masters School. I'm grateful to those who made the trip out and stood by me during the teaching of the school. It was a huge success and the public in particular enjoyed the games. So what's next for my MMOs? After much thought I've decided on a return to simulation. The original SimCity came out on the Commodore 64 and as the title suggests was the first of it's kind. It was basically a city building game but without the usual trappings of a SimCity. I'm trying to recreate the experience of building a city up from scratch, working out exactly what I want the desired outcome to be. So if anyone out there is like me and enjoys simulation games like SimCity, I'd love to hear from you. Send me a mail at gm@brinc.com The developer blog is at brinc.com The second day of the Game Masters School at the NMCMA brought a packed schedule. The games of the day were: Star Trek: The Next Generation: Quantum Realities Voyager: Replaced Mind Star Trek: Dominion: Ascendants The project in question was The Next Generation: Quantum Realities. The game looked like a trifle – a bit like a TNG DVD, but with music. This is very ambitious for such a small project. However, the game is impressive in its ability to integrate the on screen data with the music. The game provided many questions – such as, "Should we randomise the music at the beginning of each game?".

"Could the music be varied between plays

Awesome Zombie Shooter HardcoreGamer20 September 2015 Even though its quite a short game you will most likely download this if you like zombie games. I thought the game was fun but the controls were a little bit off balance at the start. After that though its just a blast to play, great graphics and an awesome soundtrack. 5 Survival Games DeathAttackXI Aug 2015 This game made me wanna crawl in a hole and die with it. The half-baked gameplay left me struggling for the control stick. If I were a developer, I'd either change some of the controls or make them tighter to avoid users with only a Wii Remote from getting this title. But... I digress. Gone Wrong Gunner21 May 2015 I started this game with high hopes, but I was really let down by the controls on the first playthrough. It kept making me spam my right thumb for the shooting motion, and the wrong thumb for the jump button, and the shooting button. I had to play the game three times to get the controls down, and even then the only game I ended up losing was the first. 5 GONE WRONG BPS31 Mar 2015 Simply put, this is a very well made game. Your probably going to hate it at first, the controls are pretty messed up. Some weapons make the player invincible for a short time but im not going to list them out, keep trying and you'll figure them out. The first few missions are very difficult, as in, they will put a bullet through you so fast and with such ease your going to die most likely. After that you'll get a feel for this game and things will become easy (for the uninitiated). Graphics are very high quality, the sound is also very strong. This game brings some nice ideas into place, but sadly it is not as polished and difficult as it should be. To those of you interested: The objective of this game is to make it as far as possible without dying on Lake Koerner Our crew of two paddled around Lake Koerner and spotted eels in the small lake in the park. Twice we spotted eels, once to the right of the canoe and once out to the stern. Both eels saw us, rather than us them. Outnumbering us considerably, they moved slowly towards a shallow area where the weeds are impeded as they wish to avoid having their slimy bodies torn into pieces as they do with us humans on their loathe... So far this year the fire has gotten out of control several times on Mount Colby. A couple days ago, we hiked up to take a look at the region and found that Gandy Creek has been affected by the blaze which in its ravaging stages is three miles long and half way to Jasper. It's no surprise to me that the fire has been able to travel so far, as during the hot daytime temperatures last week, torching brush was fairly easy. Evidently, several days of clouds and miserable weather have helped to slow the fire, as the Cross Roads Mountain Fire, as it is named, has been held in check at about a quarter of a mile from Gandy Creek, which is not set aflame, while it can be seen at the ridges it is crackling up to enter a lower area where there is more dry fuel in various places. I think the fire is moving slowly tonight as well, once it takes a liking to the area above Gandy Creek, the grasslands are usually so short over there that it'll travel well and not get any competition from green grass. But, just because the tinder dry grasses have spoked the interest of the fire, doesn't mean there won't be a few more dry spots to burst into flames later this week if nothing happens to quell it. We plan to be gone for a week and had hoped for good weather for our beginning weekend trip, but it ended as a wet dawn. There was some rain falling in the night and as the morning went on, we saw more stormy weather on the way. So, we turned towards Cranbrook and had a chance to hit the water at the start of our week-long trip. If we had set out in the morning, we'd have been forced to pay for our early trip with high water at the reservoir's dam which encircles the lake a few miles from the town. While we are only paying for two nights in two different

Do you know how to do damage? Can you destroy your enemies with all their might? No, I don't think you do, because nothing about Arena of Valor says "destroy." There's no gunfire, no ultimates, no combos. If a hero's not under half life, if they're not an inch off the ground, if they're not making use of the rooftops, if they don't have an ice wall behind them when you run up to them and expect them to block your path, they're probably not going to do anything right. But if they do—and if you're anything like me, you will—you'll just go. "Yeah! No way! How hard can this be?" Like, I think the skill cap is pretty high. It's somewhere between Trials of Mana and Mario Kart. Unfortunately, Arena of Valor also includes the bane of any exciting new arena game: the raid. Three teams of four heroes—the difference being that one of the teams is forced to play as a [insert team name here] one, who is a lesser variant of their original class—run around and don't get killed until one of you presses that big red button and the fight ends. It's not an unreasonable or even particularly difficult mode, but it takes forever to die in, and you spend your time waiting to die thinking about the amount of money you're spending, because the game makes you spend a ridiculous amount of money. There's also a lot of hero dueling, which is way more enjoyable, but once again, spending gold and getting your card back to buy your way out of it. Then, once you're done with that, it's time for more money. "Needless to say I bought it on the first day it was out, and I've spent at least three times that since then, but given the game's odd blend of action and RPG, things are far from settled."
