To investigate the characteristics of coronary arterial function in patients with end-stage renal disease (ESRD) and hypertension. A total of 38 patients with ESRD and hypertension (hypertensive ESRD group) and 38 normal individuals (control group) were examined. The patients with ESRD were older and had higher body mass index. Their electrocardiogram revealed abnormal changes of QT and QTc intervals and higher rate of positive Q wave. Invasive coronary arterial blood pressure and cardiac output were reduced in both groups. The patients with hypertensive ESRD had increased HR, WBC, hs-CRP, triglyceride, FFA and reduced NOx levels in the plasma, and the reduction of cardiac output was more marked in the patients with hypertensive ESRD. The coronary reserve was reduced in both groups, the reduction of coronary reserve was more marked in the hypertensive ESRD group. Coronary vascular resistance was positively correlated with HR, myocardial oxygen consumption and LVEF, while the reduction of coronary vascular resistance was associated with HR, myocardial oxygen consumption, left ventricular systolic performance and left ventricular end-diastolic pressure. The coronary arterial function is related to many factors such as HR, myocardial oxygen consumption, left ventricular systolic performance and left ventricular end-diastolic pressure in patients with ESRD and hypertension, whereas the reduction of coronary reserve is related mainly to HR
