According to the WHO's nutrition and diet recommendations. children should not have more than 100 mg of sugar a day. In the United States the daily recommended limit is 100 to 150 calories. The WHO said there has been much concern about high levels of aspartame, which is used in diet drinks, sugar-free chewing gum and baked goods, among other foods and beverages. Research has shown that children may be more sensitive to the effect of the sweetener, the organization said. The number of people who have become sick with symptoms such as vomiting, diarrhea, abdominal pain and flushing is unknown. Some of the symptoms can mimic the symptoms of food poisoning, which have resulted in a recent outbreak of botulism in Mexico, the WHO said. "We don't know whether an individual bout with these symptoms is associated with a particular level of aspartame in the body," said Dr. Rita Galis, the assistant director-general for WHO's Department of Nutrition for Health and Development. The outbreak of botulism has also affected

16 people in Canada and the United States, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The source of the botulism cases is not yet known, the CDC said. Data on aspartame use in the United States is not available. The WHO, in its new recommendations, says the data on aspartame safety in children is "uninterpretable." Other artificial sweeteners that have been widely used include saccharin, a popular sugar substitute since the 1950s; sucralose, an artificial sweetener used in diet products and some snacks; and acesulfame potassium, a synthetic sweetener that is approved for use in children's vitamins and iron fortified cereals, the WHO said. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has investigated whether aspartame was a cause of an outbreak of neurological symptoms and cancer among 6d1f23a050
