The statistical model is based on data that is five years old. It is not likely to account for changes that have occurred in the five years since that data was collected. The following graph illustrates how the enrollment system came close to making the cutoffs imposed by the Affordable Care Act (ACA) for 2014. The enrollment deadline was set for January 1, 2014. The enrollment rate makes it appear as though Healthcare.gov barely missed the cut-off, but when the distribution of enrollment numbers is broken out, it appears that there was a big mismatch between the number of applicants (33 million) and the number who are actually enrolled (28 million). The graph above shows enrollment breakdown by age. This graph was published in the Washington Examiner on November 5, 2013. It contrasts enrollment numbers against the number of applicants. For example, there were 30 million applicants aged 19 to 26 and 21 million in this age group who are enrolled. But there were 29 million applicants aged 27 to 34 who are enrolled. This is a "91 percent overlap" in the numbers. The next graph shows enrollment distribution by income. There are a total of 30 million applicants for this group, and 28 million applicants are enrolled. This is a 91 percent overlap in the number. So an even higher percentage of applicants were successfully enrolled in the government plan than were applicants who were not eligible. This means that the number of enrollees is vastly different than those who were not eligible. In other words, more people have been enrolled in the new government health care plan than was initially anticipated. The final graph shows enrollment breakdown by eligibility. There are 28 million enrollees and 30 million applicants. This is a 95 percent overlap in numbers. There are an estimated 22 million applicants who were not eligible, so that means there were 7 million enrollees who were not eligible. The government appears to be more successful at providing care to those who are eligible than to those who are not. The number of enrollees is larger than was anticipated. This means that Healthcare.gov is not a failure. It is actually a success. It may even be a runaway success. And it appears that the newest administration 6d1f23a050
