In a potential boon for the Antelope Valley, Cal State Fullerton has finally found the financial and political footing to pursue a deal for a UC Davis facility, according to an arrangement outlined in a draft of a newly released campus master plan. Cal State Fullerton's successful bid to land the much-discussed UC Davis athletics facilities, first reported by the San Jose Mercury News, will be paired with an equally lucrative agreement to purchase a UC Davis football stadium, with the university using the 34,000-seat stadium to host its baseball program. Cal State Fullerton officials will spend the next year or two refining the proposal with UC Davis officials and refining the master plan to meet the university's new guidelines, which, for the first time, grant university presidents the authority to approve campus real estate acquisitions, according to documents provided to the Daily Titan by Cal State Fullerton Chancellor Timothy P. White. "I've been to UC Davis. I know how they like to work with other schools and different universities," White said. "They're supportive of trying to get different schools, schools of the caliber of UC Davis, to maybe come on board and kind of help finance it." The university has placed special emphasis on finding new ways to attract top-tier athletics facilities to the Antelope Valley, and UC Davis has one of the stronger academic profiles on the West Coast. Cal State Fullerton officials are hoping that a UC Davis stadium, football facility and the campus master plan will be enough to entice the university to apply the same kind of San Jose State/San Diego State branding they recently established on the Cal State Northridge campus. "The longer they continue the isolation, I would think that the student body will just start to accept being students at Cal State Fullerton,◆ 6d1f23a050
