The move comes following many financial institutions being declared bankrupt or heading that way, after their insolvency due to debts. The French government has said those businesses cannot pay their debts and must repay workers, who are now often calling the employees' agreements useless. One such person affected by the bankruptcy courts' actions was Richard Allan, who was a company secretary at the failed business Iveco, in the city of Lyons. He was a vital part of the company's administration - but the judges found him guilty of fraud, and he has been declared bankrupt. But even bankrupts themselves are at a disadvantage when trying to settle their debts, with the courts setting out a selection of rules. For example, a firm which is declared bankrupt will be made to pay interest on what is called a "derogatory" rate of interest. This is the amount of interest in addition to the 10% set by law if a firm is not already paying it. It is a deduction from the payments owed, which comes into play if a firm is unable to pay. The court will usually also force a bank in liquidation to pay with a real interest rate. This is the official interest rates which would apply if it were depositing its funds with a bank, rather than receiving them as a loan. In addition, the firm may be forced to pay interest at the "real cost" of lending it the money. This is the amount paid for borrowing money on the market. The court may also use the "real cost" of lending the money to recover the cost of providing the service of administration. A company being run in bankruptcy will also have a burden imposed on it if it wishes to borrow to keep it going until its receivers can buy it in the hope of a sale. Lawyers are often part of the process, as they will need to make sure the court is in line with financial regulations, and the other players being declared bankrupt will need a lawyer as well.
