wnload.Q: How to determine if Earth's atmosphere causes the greenhouse effect? Every discussion on greenhouse effect (SE or otherwise) seems to mention the effect of CO<sub>2</sub>, but nobody seems to mention that is has nothing to do with the atmosphere. The effect is

due to water. How do we know that? An example would be: If the only greenhouse gas in the atmosphere is water vapor, how can it be the cause of greenhouse effect? A: Some of the confusion may be from the different types of greenhouse effect. One of them is the "greenhouse effect of the atmosphere" known as the atmospheric greenhouse effect that has nothing to do with CO<sub>2</sub>. The greenhouse effect of the atmosphere refers to a greenhouse effect on plants caused by the radiation absorbed by the atmosphere itself, from infrared radiation (long wavelengths) that is re-radiated back to Earth.

---

This is referred to as direct greenhouse effect.

The atmospheric greenhouse effect occurs because radiation from the earth's surface to space is concentrated around the infrared region of the spectrum, and this concentrated radiation is absorbed by the atmosphere, which thus becomes warmer. The atmospheric greenhouse effect contributes to the greenhouse effect of the atmosphere. CO<sub>2</sub> is not one of the greenhouse gases, and is usually used only as one of many "forcing" gases or radiative forcing gases. It affects the atmosphere

through the radiative forcing caused by absorption and emission of radiation, as described by the following: The radiative forcing is the change in net radiation (energy) received by the planet as a result of a change in radiation by the atmosphere. Radiative forcing is quantified as the change in radiant flux (units of  $W\ m^{-2}$ ) and can be calculated from measured or calculated radiative fluxes. Radiative forcing is primarily caused by absorption and emission of IR radiation, in this case in the infrared portion of the spectrum.
