the second method is called mic-wpa-crack. this method performs a dictionary attack on the 8-12 characters of the wep key, if the first method is unsuccessful. the difference is that in the mic-wpa-crack method, only the 65 characters of the 802.11 header are used instead of just the frame body. this means that more packets can be used for the mic-wpa-crack method. the mic-wpa-crack method works in two phases as well. in the first phase, aircrack-ng only uses the 65 characters. if the key is not found, then it uses all the packets in the capture. please remember that not all packets can be used for the mic-wpa-crack method. this tutorial: packets supported for the mic-wpa-crack attack page provides details. a significant limitation is that the mic-wpa-crack attack currently can only crack 40- and 64-bit wep keys. aircrack-ng provides an optional fifth attack method called pskcrack. this method is very similar to the mic-wpa-crack method except it uses all possible psk keys and not just the 65 characters. it works in three phases as well. in the first phase, aircrack-ng only uses the 65 characters of the wep key. if the key is not found, then it uses all the packets in the capture. the second phase of the pskcrack method splits the 65 characters of the wep key into 5 groups, each having a 16 character prefix and a 16 character suffix. this means that 5 psk keys will be tested in this phase. if all 5 keys are unsuccessful in this phase, then the third phase is performed. it uses all the packets in the capture and uses all possible 5 key pairs in the third phase. a final limitation of this method is that the
