Execution is a little more complex than that, because i need to fetch a valid script, put it into a zip file that i can execute. I also need to insert a string, and finally, i need to craft the packet for the roulette bot to see. The roulette bot will then attempt to execute the script, and once it has finished, it will immediately disconnect to the remote IP it sent the packet to.

Pretty standard for the group, nothing much to say on the Knox. I can think of a few tricks to get access to a webserver, but a full box would be a good test to see if something more obscure exists. Here is something of a new phish. This is the Emotet group that never really dropped their version 0 access they have. Word docs with base64 command lines get their own category. Its a really simple file include that uses a standard, not the most in-vogue, method for make an image to get code execution. The image was already executing, but with a lot of imports to way too many trusted binaries. I tested this exact exploit, and was able to get an elevated shell. I didnt see any AV help at the time, so its likely there are some AV changes in the works. Roulette sniper makes you win roulette the easy way.
