Tucked into the final pages of the New York State Budget is a threat that again could become a reality: the state's broken monopolies and ternary Internet usage fees. In late 2013, Gov. Andrew Cuomo's administration proposed a cut in the state's universal service budget, which finances non-profit Internet access programs and covers the cost of Internet speed upgrades for low-income New Yorkers. It also eliminated a $15 ternary Internet usage fee that the state imposed on residential customers who signed up for a triple-play, which includes telephone, cable television, and broadband Internet service. Ternary fees fund broadband maintenance and expansion projects and are supposed to make it easier for new Internet users to get up to speed. The move would have saved New Yorkers $4 million. Cuomo backed down after public outcry. "I'm not cutting the universal service budget," he said at the time, but the issue is again a part of his latest proposed budget, which he submitted to the state legislature today. New York state eliminated its ternary-fee program in 2013. Ternary fees are charged to residential customers who subscribe to triple-play service packages from providers like Verizon, Time Warner Cable, and Charter. On the customer's bill, there are a series of tiered fees, with the lowest tier, pre-2002, is $0.52 per month and higher tiers kicking in at $0.80, $1.00, and $1.15. This structure makes it hard to find out how much the fee adds to your bill. A number of people shared the problem with us after we wrote about the state's ternary fees a year ago: it's unclear how much and how often they
