IVT BlueSoleil 10.0.496.1 Multilingual Fix [SadeemPC].zip Serial Key Keygen.Certain types of precipitation processing systems require multiple influent water flows for different types of processes being carried out, e.g. wet scrubbing or steam stripping. Such configurations are referred to herein as multi-flux systems. The multiple streams are generated from a single source of water, such as a river or the ocean. Typically, the incoming water is first treated to remove impurities such as suspended solids, salt, etc. before it is used as the influent for a precipitation system. A common type of impurity removal system is an electrochemical system having one or more electrode pairs. A conventional electrochemical system includes a first set of electrodes for producing a calcium depleted or deionized influent water stream having a first characteristic, such as a high conductivity. The electrochemical system also includes a second set of electrodes for producing a high purity water stream having a second characteristic, such as high purity. The high purity process water stream is recovered and may be re-used for processing operations such as cooling, dilution, heating, stripping, vapor extraction, etc. Multi-flux systems with high purity water and calcium depleted or deionized influent water are described in U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,935,590, 6,058,843, 6,077,368 and 6,139,608. U.S. Pat. No. 5,935,590 to Bruis teaches an apparatus for producing a deionized water stream having a low conductivity. The apparatus includes a first electrode for producing a first deionized water stream and a second electrode for producing a second deionized water stream. The electrode pairs are arranged in series flow relationship to produce the deionized water streams, i.e., the electrode pairs are arranged in series water flow relationship. U.S. Pat. Nos. 6,058,843 and 6,077,368 to 79a2804d6b
