The new Lightroom 5.2 version is much more well rounded as a RAW workflow solution, and the ability of individuals to build their own workflow and put their own spin on things is a great boon to them. It is a software program that you will not see a duplicate of anytime soon. Though a simple and useful software package, I have a question as to how much support you would get from Adobe with a program like Lightroom, so check the company out before you get your money's worth. However, I would prefer to use Lightroom over other RAW editing software due to the fact that unlike Lightroom, the other programs use their "technology" to the extend that it get's in the way of the photographer. I think of Lightroom as a collection of tools. Some of these tools do a lot of things well and some do other things, but they all work together to create some sort of workflow. In Lightroom 5.2, Adobe continues to give photographers the tools they need to work effectively with their files, programs that are much improved over previous versions. One of the main strengths of this application is the ability to import and export photos off of devices. Handy features include the integration of Flickr into Lightroom to provide more information relative to a file's origin at the time of acquisition and even enhancing that information as well. The backup and restore features are also Windows-based, which is always a plus. I also like the ability to use a touch screen to navigate some of the features, and the instant feedback when you make a mistake is sure to make anybody feel like a Photoshop Ninja.
