Interaction of CSF-1 and its receptors in monocyte development and function. Monocytes are the myeloid precursors of macrophages. This review describes the role of macrophage colony-stimulating factor (M-CSF, CSF-1) and its receptor (CSF-1R) in monocyte differentiation and function. Several classes of cells, which synthesize M-CSF, become accessory cells that are critical in the development of monocytes. M-CSF enhances the survival and differentiation of monocytes during their development into macrophages.

M-CSF-deficient mice are characterized by decreased numbers of monocytes/macrophages in the bone marrow and blood. Similarly, CSF-1 transgenic mice have increased numbers of monocytes and macrophages in the blood. M-CSF and CSF-1 control macrophage differentiation by causing their precursors to become stationary within the monocyte/macrophage
