We present a novel technique for the fabrication of a miniature mercury-ion-sensitive sensor based on the incorporation of an ultrathin Au film on a polysilicon cantilever. A microstructured polysilicon cantilever was used to deposit the Au film. The characterization of the sensor response was performed with a specially designed electromechanical test bench. The microsensor was used to detect mercury ions in solution. Linearity between the output voltage and mercury concentration was observed up to a concentration of 0.5 mmol L<sup>-1</sup>. The limit of detection was 4.9 × 10<sup>-5</sup> mol L<sup>-1</sup>. The sensitivity of the sensor was 200 V nm<sup>-1</sup> mol L<sup>-1</sup>. Finally, the sensor responded to the presence of mercury ions in an air sample, indicating the possibility of using the device for on-line mercury detection in an indoor environment.The goal of this proposal is to develop a basic science training program in vascular biology for outstanding students in the biomedical sciences. For example, such a classification can be established for large quantities of documents automatically by examining the document header for certain keywords and placing the document in an appropriate category based on the keywords found in the header. Similarly, for documents having proprietary content (that is, content not subject to regulation or copyright), it can be established what genre of document they are. For example, a large number of documents may be received by an organization as part of a telecommunication, and these documents may be telecommunication related, for example, customer requests, inquiries, complaints, or troubleshooting. If the content of such documents is not known to the organization, a human being attempting to classify these documents is likely to make a number of mistakes when attempting to classify the documents manually. For example, the human will have difficulty determining what classification an unknown document belongs to, may base the classification on incorrect information, and/or may have difficulty determining that a document belongs in a particular category.Jatinder Sandhu Jatinder Sandhu is an Indian politician and a member of the Bharatiya Janata Party.
