Systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) is a systemic autoimmune disease characterized by widespread lupus involvement. It is one of the most common autoimmune rheumatic diseases and has a prevalence of roughly 76,000 women in the U.S. alone. SLE is characterized by pathogenic autoantibody production, immune complex deposition and complement activation. The disease is also characterized by immune dysregulation and by the presence of a wide variety of non-organ-specific autoantibodies, including anti-double-stranded DNA and anti-Sm autoantibodies. A number of associated clinical manifestations include arthritis, vasculitis and nephritis. Arthritis is the most common clinical manifestation of systemic lupus erythematosus. It is often insidious in onset, progressive and associated with high morbidity and mortality. It is likely that the development of arthritis in patients with SLE is determined not only by the individual immune and molecular mechanisms by which arthritis is initiated, but also by the relative importance of these molecular mechanisms in the different clinical manifestations of the disease. The etiology of arthritis in SLE is still obscure, but experimental and clinical data suggest an important role for the immune complex deposition. The hallmark of arthritis in SLE is the deposition of immune complexes in synovial fluids and tissues. This is probably due to the presence of non-organ-specific (nuclear, cytoplasmic or viral) antigens that are associated with the immune complexes and that are recognized by the immune system. The immune complexes are deposited in the subcellular structures of synovial cells, such as collagen and glycosaminoglycans. The above-described mechanisms provide a number of potential targets for development of therapeutic agents for the treatment of arthritis in SLE. However, to date, no therapeutically useful drugs have been developed for the treatment of arthritis in SLE.
