subscapularis muscle were investigated in 17 shoulders in 13 cadavers. The anterior, anteroinferior, and inferolateral positions of the tenaculum were performed during 4-0 nylon tendon forceps delivery of the forceps. The position of the tenaculum was significantly correlated with the total force required to deliver the forceps. A tenaculum significantly increases the force needed to deliver the forceps. The human papillomavirus (HPV) is a double-stranded DNA virus and consists of a small circular genome of about 7,000 nucleotides (L. M. Sherman, et al., J. Infect. Dis. 152:1115-1123 (1985)). HPV attaches to the cell membrane by means of viral proteins which contain amino terminal regions and a carboxyl terminal membrane anchor domain. These proteins are designated p60c and p66 (M. J. McBride, et al., J. Virol. 59:1916-1922 (1986)). The proteins p60c and p66 contain a carboxyl terminal membrane anchor domain that enables HPV to attach to the host cell membrane. The carboxyl terminal membrane anchor domain interacts with the amino terminal region of the p60c and p66 proteins. The amino terminal region of the protein p60c contains three distinct sequences that exhibit binding activity for lipids, which include glycosaminoglycans and cholesterol (C. W. Pracht, et al., J. Virol. 63:3564-3576 (1989)). The amino terminal regions of the p60c and p66 proteins contain no enzymatic activity but may have some influence on the stability of the genome (A. Ott, et al., Arch. Virol. 120:391-399 (1994)). A second DNA sequence encoding a polypeptide of about 40 kilodaltons (kDa) is present in the viral genome. This DNA sequence encodes two proteins, designated E6 and E7, which are expressed from a single mRNA transcript (E. R. Ostens-Silberberg, et al., J. Virol. 60:715-725 (1986)). A function of the E6 protein is to f988f36e3a
