Hinduism and Jainism are the two oldest surviving religions in India. Hinduism is the dominant religion in India today, although the situation has been changing in the past few decades due to the emergence of other religious groups, which are now the majority in the eastern part of India. Hinduism, as defined and practiced in India, is an umbrella term that covers a variety of related but distinct traditions, ranging from the monotheistic Vedic religion and Shaivism of ancient India to Shaktism, Sanatana Dharma, Vaishnavism, Saivism, Shinto, Buddhism, Jainism, and Sikhism. The core beliefs of Hinduism include various concepts, including: the unity of existence, the concept of Dharma as the universal law of nature, the transmigration of souls and karma, the existence of God, and the importance of ritual and religious merit. Based on the works of Max Muller, A. F. R. Hardy, M. R. Pandit, and other scholars, as well as on the traditions of native literature and language, this article provides a general description of Hinduism and highlights the most salient aspects of Hindu beliefs and practices. It also briefly discusses various religions within Hinduism.

History: Most Hindus today consider Hinduism to have been originally an Indo-European religion. Hinduism is the third largest religion in the world. Sykes based his arguments on works by Jains and Muslims who wrote that Hinduism originated in the Punjab region. Among the Rigvedic hymns, the Indus Valley script is still visible. The historian Max Müller and the scholar from Bombay, R. E. D. MacLennan, eventually confirmed the same. The theory of the indigenous origin of Hinduism has been rejected by modern scholars. Max Muller's reconstruction of the original religion was developed over decades and was based on the works of many leading scholars. His reconstruction was used in the official history of India by the Governor General of India. However, modern scholarship is agreed that the core concepts of Hinduism originated among the Dravidian peoples of South India. Archaeological evidence shows that the early Indus
