Since Adobe made the announcement of CC, I have been a little less than excited when it comes to the applications they will be bringing to the new version. However, I haven't looked much into CC yet, so the experience may be a little different.

I have both Photoshop and Photoshop Elements 11 months. I have just update my Mac to Yosemite. I found that I couldn't open the Layers in Elements 11. This was annoying having to work in Elements. I have now switched back to Photoshop Fusion and am using Photoshop Elements 11. There is a specific setting in the edit menu that allows layers to be expanded from pixel to pixel. This setting no longer exists in Fusion. For some reason Fusion layers are now unable to be scaled independently of the original photo size.

Doesn't even have an imported folder. Not sure why they'd do this since there's no option to change this in the preferences. Looks like original folders are unsearchable. You get a bunch of documents in a folder, but not a folder. The whole thing moves around when you drag a file to the folder. Also, no compressing ability. Sad, really.

Adobe Photoshop CS5.5 uses a memory-mapped file system which means that the amount of available physical RAM has no impact on how much information the application can use. Before Lightroom 5, when the application had to load a catalog into memory, it had to drop to a separate memory allocation. Hence, with Lightroom 4 on a dual processor system, it sometimes would take up memory on one processor while taking up almost no memory on the other processor. CS5.5 uses native Windows Bitmap caching which means that Photoshop always uses physical RAM and does not drop to the Windows Disk cache.

The biggest change from version CS6 was the addition of the content-aware tool, which allowed users to turn standard photos into panoramas without losing quality. It defaults to a generous default setting that fills in for information where it can. In version CC, the tool also provides a quick way to flip your image into its mirrored version. Tools like this are nice, mostly because if you happen to be taking a series of photos on the same subject, having the capability to flip them around instantly can be game-changing.
