When you name a color in Photoshop, you choose one or more swatches. A swatch is a color the same shape and size as the pixel you're editing, but the overall color is a slight variation of the actual pixel color, providing subtle color differentiation within the visual image. It's almost like a small piece of paint, crayon, or ink that's perfect for laying over against a single color. Once you have a particular number of swatches, you can make layers. Layers are very convenient. You can have a layer representing the aqua background of your watercolor painting. You can then select some of the paint — in this case, the red— and put it on top of this layer. All of the paint remains visible except for the piece of paint you've selected. And if you later decide to remove the red-paint layer, you don't disturb the aqua underlayer, which would be much more difficult to separate.

- Organize an image. By using layers, you can group layers with their own settings, such as gradients, opacity, or other parameters that work to your advantage. You can stack layers with different images in each layer. By locking (frozen) a layer, you prevent any changes in color or other adjustments from being made. It's possible to craft precise compositions.

New layers can be created under either the Layer tab or the Windows tab. If you're using the Layers panel to create a layer, click New and define the settings. If you're using Windows, click New and click From File to name the new layer, and then define the settings for the new layer.
