Another problem is that you'll need to pay to download all of your data whenever you want to use it. Not only will it cost money, but it's a poor use of your bandwidth if you're downloading and storing media while your data is already on your computer.

Luckily, a new trend in computer security is emerging for users who agree to keep their data on a third-party data storage or backup service. There is no need to trust your media directly to any cloud-based service, because the backup service becomes the owner of your data.

Even more exciting, you can rest assured that if you lose any of your files, the backup service will protect you from losing it, because they have a huge file storage capacity to back up your data. There is no need to worry about losing photos, documents, videos, and other media, because only the backup service retains the media.
