Whether you are using the tools in Photo Editor to recolor an image or recenter it (for me, it's always useful to center an image), you'll definitely find something that is missing. Since 2015, there has been an iFixit.com for industrial-strength repairs on iOS devices. iFixit has an extremely detailed set of instructions for a number of repair solutions, ranging from small, quick fixes to major overhauls. For some of the tools such as the new Image Trace feature in Photoshop, the iFixit guides are actually more detailed than the ones found in the instructions. If you are trying to enhance the features of Photo Editor (such as Album View) or just perform some performance tweaking, iFixit is a great resource you should check out.

Regardless of the new features and improvements found in Photoshop, the older and more established desktop version of the software also deserves a bit of attention. In general, I find that Photoshop performs similar to Lightroom 5 in terms of speeding up image processing. For quick image enhancements, I think the best tool is Masking & replacing.

At first, I was downright annoyed by the fact that text & layer masks could not be shown properly on the iPad Pro's screen. I was able to find a couple of apps online that seemed to give me a better understanding of the issue. However, after my own testing, I was able to confirm that it was the iPad Pro that was at fault. Therefore, I am now actually able to use Photoshop on the computer screen while having access to all the same tools as on the desktop. Furthermore, the iPad Pro serves as an even better workstation, thanks to the Log and the Ruler tool. The Log can be used to view information about your photo such as exposure, shadows, highlights or white balance. The ruler can be used to measure, zoom in or zoom out, as well as to position the canvas in relation to the simulated window. Personally, those tools are what make me feel as though I am on the Mac, because only designers (and photographers) really understand how to view such information.

In a new update for the company's flagship software, Photoshop, top feature Adobe has added a set of extremely trendy 'Hyperlapse' tools. As the software development is powered on a fraction of the planet, it must be heavily dependent on some of the resources found in the satellite locations.

We can count ourselves lucky! If we were dealing with Australia back in the day... we would have to apply for a visa and for a visa we had to affix the same stamp to the immigration office and it is usually a really exorbitant cost for someone who cannot afford it. There was really no other option except to wait for months and then finally we might be able to see our family members! Don't worry for we have an online stamping service that makes our family trip a lot more easier to bear. With us the process is a lot less stressful and we can afford to take care of other things in life while our trip is on hold. In case you have come to PMDDrubby on Rails to grab your information from the Ruby on Rails migration guide, you may have noticed that it's quite out of date. We've decided to change that and keep the project updated to ensure we get the right versioning for the project. We currently have three versions of migration (1.6.0.1, 1.8.0 and 2.0.0). You may have been warned about the upcoming 2.0.0 version by receiving the Notice of Rails Migration and migrating to 1.8.0 release. We believe that it's critical to have a migration guide that is up-to-date and matched with our other Ruby guides in the documentation. The most notable additions are the new multi-processor options, the ability to quickly review All Scenes in a document and the ability to double-click a selected layer to edit it. But one of the more interesting features is the one that was added for professional users: The new live mask tool enables you to paint the mask to your liking instead of using traditional transparency masks. Live masks are only viewable while editing the image but allow professional retouch enthusiasts to paint out all the background without having to mask something over it.
