After the release of Lightroom 4, Evolution and Apple bought Lightroom, so I had to say bye-bye to Lightroom 3. For a long time, it had been my primary photo editor, but the Adobe Creative Suite had many powerful software modules. After the release of Lightroom 5, the CS roadmap with the new name became clear and Lightroom seemed like an innovative companion to Photoshop. Image processing was one of the tasks I used to do, but Lightroom did not have that feature and I thought about switching to Lightroom because of it. I use Adobe Photoshop for almost every processing task, including the adjustment of Lightroom. Having said that, I have some bad memories about Photoshop. It was difficult to connect with a D700, for example.

The development of Lightroom was labored until the release of Lightroom 4. A big feature of Lightroom 4 was the new Library. Libraries organize images and enable searching (online and offline) of images. This feature is very useful, but it costs a lot of memory. I have 16GB of RAM in my computer and the additional 268 MB of memory used for the storage of a library image is significant for me. Most owners of DSLRs have more than 16GB of RAM and struggle to double or even triple Lightroom memory.

I had hired a PC with 32GB of RAM, but I could not connect it to the Wacom Cintiq 12WX. A PC with 4GB of RAM could be connected, but the price was high. I wanted to purchase a new computer with 16GB of RAM, but had to buy a laptop instead because I had to travel a lot. I finally purchased a Zenbook UX32VD to connect to my iPad.
